In Time We Shall Know Ourselves

American Photographs, 1974

by Raymond Smith

In the summer of 1974, a young man drove an aging Volkswagen from New England through the South and into the Midwest, camping and photographing people and places along the way to California. The car died in Kansas City and Ray Smith took the train home to New Haven, Connecticut, where he printed some of the 750 exposures he had made with his Rolleiflex and Minolta twin-lens cameras. Few of these rare prints have been exhibited or published until now, the fortieth anniversary of Smith's trip. Hence, the title of this portfolio of 52 black and white prints—In Time We Shall Know Ourselves: American Photographs, 1974.

Smith has acknowledged “the work of Walker Evans, with whom I studied while in the Graduate Program in American Studies at Yale University in 1971-1972, and Robert Frank, whose The Americans (1959) suggested a model for my sequence.” The majority of his photographs are portraits of people encountered in his travels, with additional images of the American vernacular landscape (i.e., highways, street scenes, storefronts, movie theatres) serving as punctuation.

For Smith, “Photography...is more closely related to literature, especially fiction (despite its proclivity to depict ‘reality’), than it is to other visual arts. Whether the location is a city sidewalk, a back yard, a roadside or a door front, for me the portrait is primary, and the photograph is a short story exploding beyond its frame.” He says, “I had no intention of defining a person by his or her surroundings, though I felt intuitively that these details and incidentals offered, not commentary, but a kind of texture, lending the portraits a sheen of ambiguity and a measure of wonder, like the furniture in a room in a Henry James novel, or the reflection in a storefront window.”

Fifty-two matted and framed black & white photographs on 8 x 10 inch paper, all dated 1974. Forty-six were printed by the artist in 1974-1975 on double-weight glossy Agfa Portriga Rapid Paper because of the luminosity and tonal qualities of the paper. Six were printed by the artist in 2012 on double-weight Ilford Warm-Tone Glossy Fabric paper because the Portriga Rapid is no longer available. All will travel matted in 20 x 16 inch wooden frames.

The exhibition is available for 8-10 week periods through December 2018 for the cost of outgoing shipping, insurance, and a modest fee of $2,000.
